Library Foundation	Ms. Hansen: reported that the retreat organized by the RPLF would be held on Tuesday, March 28, 2017 from 4 to 7:30 p.m. All three boards are encouraged to attend. Further, she stated that Mr. Firestine would present as well as a number of other RPL staff members.
Administration	Mr. Firestine: reminded everyone that National Library Week is coming up and will be held April 9 -15, 2017. All were encouraged to attend the Kick-off ceremony to be held on Sunday, April 9th at 2 p.m. at the Broad Rock Library. The Honorable Levar M. Stoney, Mayor, City of Richmond, has graciously accepted the library's invitation to speak and officially start the week's activities recognizing the city's libraries. Mr. Firestine mentioned further that RPL banners were running on 8 GRTC buses in the city during the month of April (an image of the design was distributed in board packet). Mr. Olanrewaju advised that it was not appropriate to include the Mayor's name in the design that was presented and that it lacked appropriate context for inclusion. The graphic will be removed from the banner. The renovation of West End Library was reported to be moving along in spite of a 30-45 day delay. Public Art Commission meetings were held at Hull Street Library and 30-35 artists had turned out for these sessions. Ellyn Parker, Public Art Coordinator, has $51,000 available for the project which will install an art piece upon the plaza directly in front of the library. Deadline for submission is April 20, 2017. Mr. Firestine presented a schedule for selecting a library mascot for branding and promotional purposes. Information included in the board packet contained examples of utilizing a raven as a mascot, citing the connection to Richmond and literature. A discussion ensued upon the potential for a raven as the library mascot and it was determined that an election during National

	Library Week would be the best way to select a mascot representative and emblematic of Richmond. Mr. Firestine led a discussion of the library's notary policy and how the service is currently being managed at the library. Statistics and a copy of the policy were distributed in board packet. The board was asked for a consensus upon whether the service should remain and whether changes to the policy were necessary. After a discussion, that included comments from Lenora Wesley, Library Assistant II, Westover Hills Library, upon the nature of being a notary for the library and the importance of the service, the board reached a consensus to keep it as a service. Mr. Firestine was asked to provide options for continuing the service at the next meeting.
BOARD COMMITTEE REPORTS
Chairman	Ms. Zwirner: reported that she is continuing to arrange visits to council district meetings for board members. She asked when work could begin upon utilizing the Mary Morton Parsons grant. Ms. Hansen explained that there were still several pieces waiting for input from the city with regards to potential additional funding for design work, etc., but MMP funds would be available very soon.
Finance	Ms. Olanrewaju: asked Mr. Firestine to report upon the budget process. Mr. Firestine reported that the Mayor's proposed budget had been distributed (the library related section was included in packet) and the next part of the process would include agency presentations before City Council.
Facilities	Mr. Firestine reported that the flooring downstairs outside of Special Collections had been removed and work is underway with its replacement. Also, it was reported that Ms. Clarke was able to get the plants that had failed to thrive at Ginter Park, replaced by the landscaper responsible for placement during the renovation process.
Governance	Mr. Lydiard: stated that the potential board appointee's application was before the Governmental Operations Committee and would then be submitted to council for approval if the committee pushes it forward.
UNFINISHED BUSINESS
Miscellaneous questions	Ms. Francis asked Mr. Dishon about re-striping North Avenue's parking lot. Mr. Firestine explained that a request had been made to DPW and that funds for this type of work are not part of the library's budget. Ms. Francis also inquired about a Book Return for North Avenue. Library Weak?

With a diminishing budget, Richmond Public Library has challenges ahead

by Don Harrison

Richmond Magazine, April 11, 2017

It's a sleepy Sunday afternoon and there's a standing, all-ages crowd at the Broad Rock branch of the Richmond Public Library in South Side. The only library in all of Richmond (or the counties) with hours on the Sabbath is usually thick with bodies on this day of the week, but today's appearance by a sharply-dressed, smiling Mayor Levar Stoney — kicking off National Library Week — has the electric feel of a celebrity book signing.

The day is filled with light-hearted cheer, good food, a bit of speechifying about the importance of libraries and reading by the mayor, as well as Richmond Public Library's equally dapper director, Scott Firestine, and the unveiling of a cute publicity campaign to replace Readasaurus, the official RPL mascot. Library visitors are invited to choose between an owl, an otter and a turtle — all inspired by the James River and its environs — and cast their votes for the library system's new animal-suited symbol.

But for all the smiles, and Mayor Stoney's boast that the Richmond Public Library system is "the best in Virginia," this and the other eight branches of RPL will have to go through some hard changes in the coming months. It's even possible that the Broad Rock branch will have to close on Sundays.

"We have the numbers to operate, but not at the level that we need to," says Firestine, formerly the director of the Appomattox Regional Library system, in an interview a few days prior. "We may have to shorten our hours, and cut back on library programs and outreach programs."

The proposed RPL budget for 2017-2018 is just under $6 million to operate nine branches. Of that total, $5,281,626 comes out of the city's general fund — down from the previous year's $5,492,382, with most of the cuts coming in an early childhood development initiative, public computer access and reference services. A separate $400,000 goes to support the RPL law library, which is its own collection. The rest is revenue from fees, donations, federal grants and used book sales. In the 2016-2017 budget, RPL took a 16 percent cut. In the new mayor's first budget, 2017-2018, it's a smaller, 9 percent cut. "We're still in a deficit in obtaining books, e-books and securing access to electronic databases," Firestine says.

The ongoing library renovations have been a challenge the last five years," the director explains. "Richmond Public Library undertook a library renovation plan in 2008 and so we've done one library a year. Many of the libraries were built in the '50s and '60s and were just kind of falling apart, so these renovations are really just to get them up to speed." The overhauls were funded through former Mayor L. Douglas Wilder's City of the Future plan.

The renovations are nearly done, with the remaining West End branch scheduled to reopen in August. "The last three years, one branch of the library system has been closed for renovation," Firestine says. "We've taken that staffing and spread it across the network, so we backfilled our vacancies with those positions. Problem is that when the West End branch reopens, we'll have nine branches with a staffing plan of eight."

"The library's struggles with manpower started eight years ago when we started closing the branches for the renovations," says David Lydiard, a member of the Library Board. "The money was pulled from our budget, so we've been short eight to 10 people the last eight years. It's been a challenge." A lack of operating dollars keeps the library from modernizing, and growing, he says. "There will be a reduction in services, the inability to be as innovative or to offer some of the things a modern library should have."

Lydiard, a five-year board member, hasn't been shy about speaking out about the library's ongoing deficit. At a recent 3rd District meeting at Pine Camp, attended by City Council President Chris Hilbert (also the district's representative), Lydiard talked about financial challenges.

"Initially we tried to handle this through the budget, but it's reaching the point where, as a responsible board, we need to make the populace aware of the conditions of the library," he says in an interview, "and most people aren't aware that the budget has been decreasing each year."

A real estate agent by day, Lydiard says that Richmond's growing population is notable for a city its size, and that the new people locating here expect a first-rate library system. "Sometimes the city has looked at libraries, like parks and rec, as luxuries. When the axe falls, they are the first to take the hit ... and then they fall into disrepair. It's the mindset that I'm concerned about. These are not luxuries; these are necessities. And especially to draw new people into the city, and to keep them."

RPL also has library envy. "Look at what they did last year," Firestine says of Henrico County. "They did a $440 million dollar bond for schools, parks and libraries, and will add their third library in five years. But they have the tax base to support it, and they were able to do that bond without raising taxes."

Henrico's 2016-2017 library budget is $18.3 million, more than three times that of Richmond, for 11 facilities. That represents a 7.2 percent increase over the previous year, mainly because of costs associated with the county's new Libbie Mill and Varina libraries. The proposed budget for 2017-2018 is $18.8 million, a nearly 3 percent increase.

For the city, special needs have been assisted by the separate Richmond Public Library Foundation.

"They help us do the extra things," Firestine says. "Like a challenge grant from the Mary Morton Parsons Foundation to raise $200,000 to provide a young adult space and digital media space for the Main public library.

"For the last year, we've worked with the foundation to raise those funds. We do the most with the tax dollars we are given, but they don't always get us the things we need to meet our mission. So our friends in the foundation help us do more."

There's some catching up to do too. "Our material collections are down. The average age of the books at the Main library is 1984," Lydiard says. "Now a lot of that is reference material, which is older, but our collection is not as current as we'd like it to be. Same thing with best-sellers. We might only be able to have two or three at a branch, and that's what gets people in the door."

"People don't have any patience waiting for a book," Firestine echoes. "We are in the Amazon.com age, if you can't one-click it and put it in a basket, you go to the next thing."

Both men are heartened by the mayor's attention to the city libraries. "It was different with Mayor [Dwight] Jones," Lydiard says. "We only saw him for the ribbon-cuttings." Stoney is vowing to visit all of the branches before Library Week concludes on April 15. His public schedule includes visits Wednesday to the Main library (101 E. Franklin St.) at 10 a.m. and the Hull Street branch at 11 a.m., and a Thursday stop at the East End branch at 10 a.m.

Firestine, on the job less than a year, thinks that the new administration is trying to turn things around. "I feel very supported," he says. "They really are trying to do their best. The library has had challenges for a long time and some systems aren't working as they should. But I feel like people are trying to address those challenges. There are just so many demands on the limited revenue that the city has right now, and the schools have been the main ones who have taken any spare dollars in the city's budget."

At Broad Rock, after the smiling speech, Mayor Stoney grew serious when asked about the future. "Libraries and Parks and Rec have to be priorities. Yeah, I know we're going to have tough choices to make." He points to an upcoming library performance review that will be released in the coming week. "That report is what is going to allow us the opportunity to find efficiencies. It's going to give councilpeople, and me as well, the opportunity to weigh priorities. We know what the challenges are and we know what the public expects from their library."

UPDATE: Since this story was published, Richmond City Council members have introduced budget amendments that would, if adopted, restore some of the diminished library funding.

Boosting police pay, restoring leaf collection, avoiding library cuts are among Richmond City Council's proposed budget amendments

By NED OLIVER Richmond Times-Dispatch Apr 11, 2017

Richmond City Council members say they're pursuing budget amendments to boost police and firefighter salaries, retain vacuum leaf collection and avoid a reduction in library operating hours.

The deadline for council members to submit their proposed tweaks to Mayor Levar Stoney's budget was Tuesday afternoon, and while a full list won't be presented publicly until next week, council members offered a broad overview in interviews on Monday and Tuesday about the direction budget talks will take in the coming weeks.

The biggest item council members said they plan to take on is a $2.7 million increase for public safety pay, for which both the fire and police chiefs pleaded in budget hearings last month.

"I want to give the police and fire the money they need," said Councilwoman Reva Trammell, who said she submitted a budget amendment for the increase.

Police Chief Alfred Durham has said his department has struggled to retain officers, who he said are leaving for better-paying departments faster than replacements can be trained.

Stoney's budget already includes $3.2 million in additional funding — enough to bring the police department back to its full authorized strength. But Durham said it's not enough.

Council members seem to agree. Many of them, including City Council President Chris Hilbert and Councilwoman Ellen Robertson, have expressed support for addressing pay discrepancies that make Richmond officers among the lowest paid in the area.

"We've got to do something to get our police officers to stay," Trammell said. "We've already had 21 homicides in the city this year."

Another target for potential changes: Stoney's proposed elimination of residential vacuum leaf collection.

Stoney instead has proposed requiring residents to put their leaves in bags, which would be picked up every two weeks as part of a more frequent collection of bulk trash and brush items.

Residents, particularly in leafier neighborhoods, are not thrilled. In response, Councilwoman Kristen Larson said she proposed a budget amendment that would pull $500,000 from the new bulk and brush program back into the line item for leaves, so the city can offer vacuum collection to residents as an on-demand, fee-based service.

"I'm trying to ensure that residents who have these huge yards and tons of leaves can still access a service where they can get their leaves vacuumed if they choose to do so," said Larson, whose district stretches from Westover Hills to Stony Point and accounts for about 40 percent of the leaves collected in the city annually.

Council members have also floated a number of smaller changes.

Hilbert said he is committed to finding funding to restore $211,000 in general fund money cut from the Richmond Public Library in the proposed budget.

The library's director, Scott Firestine, told the City Council he would have to reduce hours across branches without the money, which he said is necessary to hire six employees to staff the soon-to-reopen West End branch, which received the last of nine branch renovations that started in 2008.

"When West End opens, we'll be operating nine libraries with a staff for eight," Firestine said.

Councilwoman Kim Gray said she is proposing to put a program in the budget specifically for alley repair and maintenance. In presenting his budget, the mayor called for dipping into a projected year-end budget surplus to provide $700,000 to address 1,300 of the city's 3,200 outstanding alley maintenance requests.

Gray said funding for the repairs should be in the budget as a program instead of provided only if money is left over.

Conspicuously absent from amendment discussions this year is Richmond Public Schools, which last year was the focus of much of the council's budget wrangling.

The school system requested a $16.8 million funding increase from the city this year. Stoney did not meet that request but included a $6.1 million funding increase in his proposed budget — a significant bump over the flat funding that then-Mayor Dwight C. Jones proposed in prior years.

So far, no council members have signaled that they're interested in providing additional funding beyond what Stoney's budget proposal included. Instead, at least some council members are contemplating using leftover school funding as a source to cover expenses in other departments.

As part of the amendment process this year, Hilbert asked his colleagues to pair proposed budget increases with cuts elsewhere. In the past, the council members have been allowed to propose increases without considering what cuts would be required to fund them.

None of the council members interviewed said they were ready to reveal what departments they are proposing to cut, but the reductions would need to be substantial, particularly to fund the widely supported increase in public safety spending.

Multiple sources with knowledge of the amendments said it's likely that some council members are proposing to dip into at least a portion of the $8.3 million budget surplus built up by the schools to cover various city needs.

Meanwhile, the school system's supporters appeared at the City Council's public comment period on Monday to plead with the council to allow the school system to keep the money.

The council is scheduled to discuss the proposed amendments and cuts at a meeting next Monday.

Libraries Quietly Struggle With Mayor's Proposed Budget

BY JACKIE KRUSZEWSKI @JACKIEKRU

Ash Daniel Mayor Levar Stoney visits the East End branch with Richmond Public Library director Scott Firestone on Thursday as part of National Library Week.

The East End branch of the Richmond Public Library system was bustling Thursday morning. And most patrons weren't there for Mayor Levar Stoney's planned visit.

Chloe Rote, who lives a few blocks away, came to pick up requested books. But she says it's the atmosphere that brings her here too.

"All the staff is really happy. People say hello," Rote says. "And the library is always so busy. It's so important to the neighborhood."

At the computers, a teenager who's 15 years and 7 months old, as she describes herself to the mayor, is applying for a job at Kings Dominion. Others are using laptops for the free wireless Internet or reading periodicals to keep up on news.

Stoney visited Richmond libraries this week in honor of National Library Week. It's a core service, he says -- "the true gateway for our communities." But, he adds, "We've got a lot of core services."

Stoney's proposed budget for fiscal year 2018 continues a downward creep in library funding. Since 2015, the libraries' budget has decreased from $5.5 million to $5.2 million.

Coupled with a rising Richmond population, the proposed $5.28 million figure would put per capita library spending at its lowest in years.

Stoney is eager to show support at the East End branch Thursday. With library director Scott Firestone and branch manager Tara Franzetti in tow, the mayor leads a toddler through his ABCs and gets behind the counter to meet staff.

Perhaps more so than other public events, people approach the mayor with ideas and feedback at the libraries. One patron who comes daily suggests some picnic tables outside, because eating inside isn't allowed.

Yusef Suggs has come to discuss gentrification in the neighborhood and introduce his middle-school-aged son to Stoney. The boy asks the mayor about his entry into public service. Stoney replies that he had an early interest in leadership and government.

For branch manager Franzetti, it isn't surprising that a library setting makes the mayor more approachable.

"Libraries are the great equalizer in society, in America, where things can be very unequal," she says. "We serve the whole community. You don't have to buy anything. You don't have to fill out a form."

They're a safe space, she says, and people are respectful of them. Franzetti makes sure the mayor meets the many regular patrons at the branch Thursday morning.

In presenting his budget to City Council on Monday, Firestine was matter-of-fact about the effects of the cuts. The $210,756 decrease would come out of part-time salaries and operating expenses.

With the re-opening of the renovated West End branch in August, the 72 full-time employees of the libraries would be spread even thinner among nine open branches.

"So we need to get that funding back because in August we'll be operating nine libraries with a staff of eight [each]," he said.

Without it, hours would need to be cut, potentially the popular Sunday hours at the Broad Rock branch -- the only library in Richmond or nearby Chesterfield County that's open Sundays. Or the opening of the West End branch might have to be delayed, Firestine said.

Meanwhile, library board chairwoman Gail Zwirner says that extending hours is the No. 1 ask from the public. Chesterfield libraries stay open until 9 p.m. on weekdays. And that's not to mention the kinds of amenities found at two stunning, high-tech libraries recently built in Henrico County.

City Council President Chris Hilbert has proposed an amendment to restore library funding to the current year's amount, and Stoney says he supports it.

This was news to Firestine on Monday, but he welcomes it. "When you have vacancies and they take a snapshot of your database, that money can be at risk or taken away," he says. The renovations of the last few years have allowed the libraries to run fewer branches with the people they had. Now they need 83 employees.

"There's no fat in our budget," he says. "We're skin and bones here."

But unlike police and fire departments, or the school board, he's not at City Council to ask for more. Like the stereotype of a librarian, Firestine doesn't want to make a fuss or fuel a budget showdown.

"I'm pointing out. I'm not asking," he says to reporters. "I'm explaining that there's a deficit and I can't operate without that money."

Libraries serve hundreds of thousands of people a year -- 517,920 since last July, according to the library board report. In addition to book access, the libraries provide Internet and computers, a free notary service, printer services, computer and adult literacy classes, children's events and more.

The mayor's cuts follow Gov. Terry McAuliffe's 5 percent library budget cut earlier this year, which led to Library of Virginia employee layoffs and reductions in hours. And President Trump has proposed cutting the budget of the Institute of Museum and Library Services, which grants money to museums and libraries across the country. (First daughter Ivanka Trump tweeted Thursday in support of libraries for National Library Week and faced a swift backlash.)

In front of the mayor on Thursday, Firestine is keen to understand.

"The mayor's budget is a balancing act. There are lots of competing priorities," he says. "It's not that this year we were singled out. I have to applaud the mayor's office for starting to dig us out of that hole."

Hilbert's amendment has support from other council members, Zwirner says, and the board members are crossing their fingers. But other council members will offer amendments starting Monday as well, and increases will have to come with cuts elsewhere.

Hilbert didn't respond to a question about what he proposes to cut to make up for the increased library funding.
